WORK IN PROGRESS

Race: A Visual and Intellectual History, a book project under review at the University of California Press.

The tentatively titled book Domination: How Power Drives Economy, and Not the Other Way Around (or, alternatively, Domination: How Marx Was Wrong) will be Bashi Treitler's third major monograph. This new book will historically trace the idea of inequality and stratification writ large in the unequal valuation of humans – a new area of research for Bashi Treitler. By giving primacy to forms of domination and the strata in which they appear, Bashi Treitler argues that dominant-subordinate or otherwise hierarchical socioeconomic relations may create economic forms, rather than the other way around. Specifically, she seeks to trace conceptually how the development of particular stratifying concepts (like black, female, foreigner/alien, etc.) influences and perhaps makes possible certain socioeconomic forms. This book will be a work of theory, developed in the process of sifting through comparative and historical data. is gathering empirical data required to offer a unified theory of domination (at least in its gendered, racial, and imperial/colonial/world systemic forms).

"Resilient Love in the Time of Hate", a special issue of Kalfou: Journal of Comparative and Relational Ethnic Studies. Collected writings and art works curated from the lecture series of the same name organized by Margaret Klawuun (UCSB); co-edited with Margaret Klawuun.

"Race and Race Theory", to be submitted to Annual Review of Sociology. Howard Winant's Annual Review article on this topic was published in 2000, and focused on racial formation theory; but there have been several theoretical developments since then, including my own. In Spring 2016 I am submitting to the editors a proposal to write an updated article that reviews theories of the 20th century and adds the contributions made in the 21st.

I am writing grants to develop content and a curriculum for the United Nations International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. I have been involved with committees involved in reporting violations of this treaty who wish to create an online database that would aid in monitoring ICERD violations, and I seek to write the curriculum and content for an online system that would educate about race and discrimination in order to aid in the collecting of data on racial discrimination in the ICERD signatory states.

Bashi Treitler, Vilna. "Racemaking at the Kitchen Table: US and Austrian Parents Rationalize Their Adopted Children" for Contexts. This publication invites scholars to write feature articles, and I had been invited to propose this work; the proposal has been accepted by the editors at Contexts.

"E-racing the Face of International Adoption," a research project on the racialization of foreign-born children adopted by "white" North American parents. This project has been funded by the National Science Foundation, and the CUNY Professional Staff Congress. Originally begun in with fieldwork in the U.S., this study is now a cross-national comparison of adoption practices in the US and Austria. A grant for research on this topic is under review at the UCSB Academic Senate, and a Letter of Interest is being prepared for summer 2017 submission to the Russell Sage Foundation.

"Enhancing Visual Methods for Sociology," a proposal to the National Science Foundation EAGER grant program, is under development.
